Usage of implantable and automated external defibrillators has problems, which is a major factor restraining market revenue growth. AEDs used in public places are periodically prone to malfunction because of problems with the battery, software, and hardware. Therapy may be postponed or may result in fatalities without defibrillation. As a result of technical issues with the way device administered shocks, electrical issues, and hardware configuration, several defibrillators have been recalled over the years. Poor product performance and, in extreme cases, patient mortality are both possible consequences of defects.
