PTA is an abbreviation for 'percutaneous transluminal angioplasty'. The tip of a PTA balloon catheter has an inflatable balloon that is used during a minimally invasive catheterization procedure. The deflated balloon is placed in the narrowed space, inflated for a short period of time, and then deflated to be removed. PTA balloons vary in size, length, and shape depending on the anatomy they are meant to treat. PTA balloon catheters can be used to treat peripheral vascular lesions in two ways. One method is to dilate the lumen of a clogged blood vessel. This procedure is known as "plain-old balloon angioplasty" (POBA). The second application is for expanding stents to treat vascular blockages.
