The firefighting segment accounted for a significant revenue share in 2021. Fire victims are less likely to sustain injuries owing to firefighting robots. In addition, it is used to spot fires and put them out before they get out of control.

In order to spray water on the regions impacted by fire, the robots either have a tank of water on board or a fire hose. With a sensor and a global positioning system, these robots are well-suited to locate the fire's source and cause.

A firefighting robot can be used for a variety of tasks, including searching for active fires, putting them out, suppressing them, rescuing people from burning buildings, and assessing the environment in a fire-affected region. In order to attain great dependability for firefighting applications, manufacturers are building firefighting robots increasing the revenue growth of this segment.
