This burgeoning industry has grown substantially since its inception in roughly 2018. With an estimated four to six million Brits having used CBD products in 2019 (<https://www.theaci.co.uk/wp-content/uploads/2020/12/Report--CBD-in-the-UK.pdf>), and current statistics estimating that the number is now closer to eight million, it is safe to say that there was quite a learning curve when it came to consumers familiarizing themselves with the CBD market and the products within it. CBD terminology isn't exactly the easiest to interpret when unfamiliar with the ins and outs of everything regarding this phytocannabinoid.

To fully understand CBD product labels, it is essential to be familiar with basic CBD terminology. One of the most commonly confused aspects surrounding CBD is its differences and similarities to hempseed. While CBD is derived from hemp, CBD and hempseed are not the same and neither are CBD oil and hempseed oil. CBD Oil King explains, "Unlike hemp seed oil which is produced utilizing hemp seeds, CBD is extracted from the stem, buds or flowers of industrial hemp and cannabis plants, where it is found in abundance." This is why they offer a user friendly website that explains everything needed about the products they offer and more. CBD Oil King explains that terpenes "are unsaturated hydrocarbons produced by many different plants, trees, fruits, and vegetables. Terpenes are aromatic compounds that can be found in things such as citrus fruits, lavender, pine, and more. They help give these things flavour and smell. When you grab an orange and tear it, that blast of citrus smell you get comes from terpenes. The flavour of that sweet, succulent orange when you take the first bite comes in part from terpenes."

Whether consumers are looking for broad spectrum gummies (gummies that include all cannabinoids minus any THC along with all other terpenes and phytonutrients from hemp) or if they are looking for CBD isolate (a CBD extract containing only CBD) that can be used to turn just about anything into a CBD product such as CBD gummies, CBD Oil King has the quality trusted brands that consumers know and love in the UK.
