North America Electronic Health Record (EHR) Market Report

Electronic health record (EHR) is a digital version of patient’s medical records. EHRs are patient-centred and real-time records, that make patient data available instantly and securely to authorized healthcare professionals. It contains patient's medical history, medications, allergies, treatment plans, diagnoses, immunization dates, radiology images, and laboratory test results. Thus, an increasing adoption of Electronic Health Records (EHRs) is expected to create a significant demand for electronic health record (EHR) in the coming years, which is further anticipated to drive the electronic health record (EHR) market.

Health systems are experiencing growing consumer engagement worldwide. In developing countries, health systems are becoming more technologically friendly. These are experiencing an internationalization of care as established brands, as well as start-ups, are expanding their businesses. For instance, the US-based Cleveland Clinic is expanding its markets in the UAE. Also, COVID-19 has accelerated the use of digital health technologies globally. The pandemic has prioritized remote monitoring solutions. Governments in the region are promoting telemedicine, offering lucrative opportunities for the patient portal market in coming years.
