Immuno-oncology medications target the immune system, one of the body's inherent defences, to combat cancer. Cancer is a collection of disorders brought on by the unchecked development and division of aberrant cells. Oncology medications are therapeutics used to treat cancer. Various types of medicines, such as chemotherapeutic agents, targeted treatments, immunotherapies, and hormone therapies, are included in the category of immuno-oncology pharmaceuticals. The negative effects of cancer medications can also be treated with a variety of medications. In immunotherapy, a specific component of the patient's immune system is used to combat disease. This is accomplished either by boosting the patient's own immune system to fight cancer cells more vigorously or by administering immune system components such as synthetic immune system proteins.
