Why Run an Arrest Warrant Search?

Many people want to know more about a person's past or if they have had some run in with the law. A warrant search is an easy means to address that concern. With a resource like SearchQuarry.com, a person can anonymously look up another person's criminal past as well as if they have a warrant for their arrest. With any device that has internet access, a person can search for this information if they have a first and last name and a state of residence for the person in question. The search only takes a few moments, and the results include a lot of information that can be useful for a multitude of reasons. Another popular reason people want to run a warrant search is to check on themselves. Perhaps there was a missed court appearance or an unpaid traffic citation or a probation violation. There are many reasons a person might want to check on a criminal record to verify if there might be an active warrant under their name.

What Information is Available with an Arrest Warrant Search

1. The full name, date of birth, address, and other identifying information.
2. Arrest records, including the date and circumstances of the arrest, the charges filed, and the sentencing and incarcerations resulting from those arrests.
3. Conviction records, including the offense, court records, sentencing and probation information, and any time served in jail or prison.
4. Probation and parole records, which can include the length of time and county where the probation was issued.
5. Mug shots of the individual that were taken when they were arrested and booked by police.

A warrant record typically contains a person's criminal background history, including any arrests, charges, warrants, court records, convictions, sentencing, and incarcerations. The details of a person's criminal history can vary depending on what resource is used.

The Legacy Way to Run a Warrant Search

Avoid Being Arrested For a Warrant

Being Arrested Can Have Profound Consequences

1. Contacting the local police department or sheriff's office. They are a resource to find out if there is an active arrest warrant or bench warrant.
2. Inquire with the relevant county clerk of court, that is charge of maintaining and issuing court records.
3. Other online criminal repository resources. Most states provide some type of online access to court records and criminal records, which can include information about arrest warrants and bench warrants. Websites such as the National Crime Information Center (NCIC) also provide information about arrest warrants.
4. Hire a private detective if more extensive information is required, or if there is difficulty locating the relevant warrant information.

It's important to take note that the information available through these different methods may vary depending on the state or relevant authority. A convenient place to start an arrest warrant search is through a privately run public record database, like SearchQuarry.com, where all searches are anonymous and can be run from home or on the go. Searching for warrants through government agencies is possible, but there is the risk is being arrested on the spot if there is an active warrant. This situation can sometimes be mitigated by finding out if there is an active warrant and then contacting legal counsel to find out how to arbitrate and negotiate a settlement or reduced penalty or surrender.

Options For Handling an Active Arrest Warrant

1. Contacting a criminal defense lawyer to seek advice on options that do not include jail time.
2. Voluntarily surrender to the courts or police to show compliance and a possible reduction in penalties or sentencing.
3. Negotiate a surrender with a lawyer to resolve the criminal case without going to trial and avoiding jail time.
4. Setup a meeting with the county clerk of the court to resolve the violation in front of a judge or court hearing.

Having an active arrest warrant can have profound consequences on a personal and professional level. Having access to this publicly available information can help to uncover a person's past, which is important to many people who want to know more about who their family and loved ones associate with. It can also be helpful in finding out if there is a warrant out for a personal situation that could result in an arrest, and being able to get in front of it, instead of ending up in jail. The SearchQuarry.com arrest warrant search tool is a good place to start this information quest. "Information is Freedom," is the motto that Search Quarry operates with.
