A medical gadget called a bone densitometer analyses bone density and keeps track of the mineral composition of the bone. Bone density testing identifies changes in bone density, potential fracture hazards, osteoporosis risk, and tracks the efficacy of treatment.

Detectors, phantoms, X-ray tubes, and power supply make up a bone densitometer. Different regions of the body are tested for bone density using both central and peripheral devices. The density of the spine and hip bones are examined by the central device; however, peripheral devices assess the density of the wrists, fingers, or heels, among other peripheral bones. Potential bone injuries result from the weakening and thinning of the bones that osteoporosis produces. Bone densitometers can therefore be utilised for early detection.
