Cardiac resynchronization therapy (CRT), also known as biventricular pacing, is a treatment used for treating arrhythmias and other disease-related abnormalities by automating right and left ventricle beating simultaneously. In order to send electric impulses into the lower chambers of the heart, the device is powered by a defibrillator, which generates a pulse. CRT devices are surgically implanted and are connected to an external computer, which sends small electrical impulses to the left and right ventricles to support simultaneous contractions. Heart failure patients who do not have their left and right heart segments pumping together will benefit from it as it improves blood flow to the heart.
