Human growth hormone, also known as HGH, refers to a peptide hormone that is produced by the pituitary gland to stimulate growth in children and adults. It generally regulates the regeneration, repair, reproduction, and metabolism of the cells, thereby contributing to the overall development of the body. Human growth hormone also manages body fluids, fat metabolism, bone and muscle growth, etc. The deficiency of HGH can increase the risk of chronic diseases and fat accumulation, whereas higher levels can cause gigantism and acromegaly, muscle-wasting disease, short bowel syndrome in adults, etc.

Human Growth Hormone Market Trends:

The growing prevalence of Turner syndrome, which is a chromosomal disorder distinguished by complete or partial loss of X chromosomes, is among the key factors stimulating the human growth hormone market. Moreover, growth hormones are usually administered to reverse some of the symptoms of this disease, thereby escalating the demand for HGH drugs across countries. Besides this, the increasing consumer health consciousness, the development of recombinant human growth hormone (rHGH), and the inflating need for preventive measures against endocrine disorders are positively influencing the global market. Furthermore, the rising occurrence of disorders, including Prader-Willi syndrome (PWS) and idiopathic short stature (ISS) that are caused by the deficiency of growth hormones in the body and can be treated by using medically synthesized medications, is acting as another significant growth-inducing factor. Apart from this, the widespread adoption of HGH as performance enhancers by bodybuilders is anticipated to fuel the human growth hormone market over the forecasted period.
