Sodium dichromate is an essential chromium product that finds extensive usage in the production of chromium pigments and chromic acid deployed in corrosion control and leather tanning. Tanning animal hides to make leather comprises permanently modifying the hide protein structure, thereby improving its durability and making its less susceptible to disintegration, as well as dyeing. The global sodium dichromate market is projected to be worth USD 1,242.4 Million by 2027, according to a current analysis by Emergen Research. The sodium dichromate market is observing high demand attributed to its growing demand from the textile industry. The application of sodium dichromate in chrome-based dyeing is of immense significance in textiles' fiber dyeing procedures. The dyeing quality of the output textile fiber, regarding color fastness and aesthetics, cannot be achieved by any kind of dye available in the market. Apart from the color characteristics and good wet fastness, the chrome-based procedure results in economic and energy-saving benefits and environmental safety.
