biomarkers, and a reinvigorated comprehension of strategic value of urinalysis in medical science have focused on urine analysis for early detection and treatment of kidney disease, pregnancy as well as other co-morbidities, such as gestational diabetes, are also expected to drive market revenue growth.

Availability of refurbished urine analyzers is a major factor restraining market revenue growth. These products provide same functionality as a new equipment but at a lower cost. Several small and medium-sized laboratories rely on low-cost refurbished systems and it is also probable that urine samples will be difficult to preserve and transport to testing facilities. Targets of interest may potentially deteriorate during the transfer of samples including test strips. Furthermore, sample contamination can occur as a result of poor collection practices when samples are gathered to allow for expression of results based on a certain time interval and urine volume. As a result, aforementioned factors are restraining market revenue growth.
