The top category of reported scams in 2022 was imposter scams, which include scams where a fraudster pretends to be a government agency, a well-known company, or a loved one to trick the victim into sending money or personal information. Other top categories of scams reported to the FTC in 2022 included online shopping and negative option marketing scams involving deceptive tactics to lure consumers into paying for products or services they did not intend to purchase.

The rise of the COVID-19 pandemic also led to a surge in pandemic-related scams in 2020, with scammers taking advantage of the public's fears and uncertainties to launch a wide range of scams, including phishing emails, fake charities, and COVID-19 treatment scams.

Unfortunately, there have been instances where scam recovery companies themselves have been involved in fraudulent activities. These companies often target individuals who have fallen victim to a scam and offer to help recover their lost funds in exchange for a fee. However, instead of providing genuine assistance, some companies may actually be scams.

One way that scam recovery companies may scam people is by demanding upfront fees without guaranteeing success. They may claim connections with law enforcement or financial institutions and promise to recover the victim's funds but then fail to deliver on their promises. Sometimes, they may even disappear with the victim's money without providing services.

Another way that scam recovery companies may scam people is by using deceptive marketing tactics to create a false sense of urgency or fear. They may make exaggerated claims about the consequences of not taking immediate action, such as suggesting that the victim's assets are in imminent danger. This can pressure victims into making impulsive decisions and handing over their money without conducting proper due diligence or research.
