"This was a sensational transaction for both companies that will not only position them for future growth but new customers and software innovation," said Wright Lewis, the DBL partner who jointly led Element 84's legal team along with partners Thomas Dunlap and Tamara Dunlap, assisted by Susan Ray and Linda Swint. "We were honored to be entrusted with this responsibility."

Element 84, a woman-owned company based in Alexandria-VA, will now have more than 100 employees. It is a leading provider of processing, visualization, and analysis of geospatial and Earth observation data for customers that include NASA and a host of commercial, state, and Federal agencies. Azavea, which is based in Philadelphia, is a cloud-native geospatial software engineering, machine learning, data analysis, project management, and UX design company.

The acquisition enhances Element 84's ability "to solve geospatial problems that address climate change and sustainability challenges globally," including water security, disaster response and climate resilience, said company President Tracey Pilone and CEO Dan Pilone.

Robert Cheetham, founder and CEO of Azavea, will become Chief Strategy Officer of the combined organizations.
