Blood plasma derivatives are products that are derived from human blood plasma, which is the clear, straw-colored liquid portion of blood that remains after red and white blood cells are removed. Plasma contains various proteins, including clotting factors, immunoglobulins, and albumin, which are used to produce a range of therapeutic products.

Plasma-derived products are produced by a process called fractionation, which involves separating the different proteins in plasma and purifying them into individual products. The plasma used to produce these products is carefully screened for infectious diseases, such as HIV, hepatitis B and C, and other viruses, to ensure the safety of the products.
