While others believe that growing plants must be done by people with green thumbs, who have a natural talent for growing crops, John will show aspiring gardeners that this is not needed.

Buying produce from the grocery store is known to be easier around the globe. On the other hand, growing their own vegetables gives a wonderful feeling when it comes to harvesting their own produce. What's even better is when these crops are high-quality and natural. This book will treat plants as if they were babies who needed to be handled with care. It will improve gardening skills from soil preparation to proper harvestation when fully grown.

John Manry, a Brigham Young University graduate, is a world-class master gardener and former Air Force officer. He used his gardening skills in various states, allowing him to turn a garden journal into a book format in order to share his knowledge with readers and support them in growing quality vegetables.
