1. Young Talents' journey to finding themselves in the 4.0 era:

To find their "destination", Gen-Z must enter the workforce and overcome countless obstacles:

• Overwhelming information:
Gen-Z online 24/7 is facing an overwhelming amount of information on the internet. With the constant flow of information online, they are often bombarded with an excessive amount of data and misleading information, making it difficult for them to filter what is important and what is not. This has caused them to lose sight of their accurate goals and direction because of the feeling of "Fear Of Missing Out."

- Distracted lifestyle:

Technology has led to a distracted lifestyle where people are easily sidetracked and have trouble focusing due to constant distractions from their devices. Since we are living in the era of too much information and lack of attention, this results in difficulty in paying attention for long periods of time and disconnecting from meaningful activities.

- High expectations:

This refers to the phenomenon where Gen-Z are faced with excessive expectations from society, their peers, and even themselves, without a clear plan or strategy for how to reach these expectations. If this continues to be repeated and puts pressure on this age group, it may cause them to give up and it can be a reason why Gen-Z doesn't want to work.

- Limited face-to-face interaction:

Gen-Z's limited face-to-face interaction is due to the increase in digital communication and social media use. This shift has led to a decrease in in-person socialization and a lack of opportunities to develop real-life social skills and relationships, impacting their mental and emotional well-being.

Gen Z inherits many advancements from previous generations to have a better life, however, these seemingly create new challenges in their journey to find their own values and meaning.

2. The pressures that make Gen-Z give up on themselves:

Gen-Z is growing up in a highly competitive educational environment, in which technologies play a significant role in determining their future success. This pressure to perform academically can be exhausting, and it may lead to feelings of inadequacy and low self-esteem.

Older generations have higher expectations for Gen-Z in academics, career, and personal relationships, which can create stress and make young people feel like they are not meeting expectations.

Many Gen-Z members face financial and economic challenges such as student loan debt, and high cost of living, leading to frustration, anxiety, and depression. These financial pressures can make it difficult for young people to meet their goals and expectations.

One of the biggest pressures that young people face today, is their own expectations for themselves which leads to the constant need to perform and succeed. With the rise of social media and the internet, it's easier than ever to compare yourself to others, and the expectations for being stand out from the crowd and success are higher than ever. This can be incredibly stressful and can lead to a feeling of burnout or a sense of giving up.

Gen-Z faces new challenges in their career journeys, but they have the energy and potential to succeed in this changing world. So what is the most common job for Gen Z?
