One of the things members tell me they appreciate most is the time multiplier effect.”

Monthly program activities include plant tours, dinners, full-day peer group sessions, and even golf outings. Some of the scheduled plant tours for the upcoming session will take place at Daniel Defense, Taylor English Duma, Alcon and Grenzebach. Each of these events is designed to foster strong peer to peer relationships, develop skills, and share the knowledge and experience of some of manufacturing's top leaders.

Each Manufacturing Mastermind activity is geared toward helping industry leaders discover and implement best practices in operations, workforce, finance, and safety, government regulations and more.

“One of the things members tell me they appreciate most” said GMA's CEO Jason Moss, “is the ‘time multiplier effect’, a critically important benefit of being a member of the Manufacturing Mastermind. The time multiplier is a direct effect of sharing best practices with other leaders who are also in the manufacturing industry, are currently meeting various challenges, and openly share their solutions with others in the group.”

Alcon General Manager Shay Foley said that he benefits from participating in Manufacturing Mastermind by learning to manage issues such as supply chain disruptions and hiring issues.

“Mastermind helps me to see that other industries have problems similar to my specific business, and my entire industry. As I listen to those problems and solutions, I get ideas of how to address my challenges using what I’ve learned.”

Bart Freeman, VP of Human Resources at Daniel Defense, had this to say about the value of his membership in this group: “The Manufacturing Mastermind is a network of professionals. The term ‘easily accessible’ comes to mind. We meet once a month, and lot of good ideas and strategies are exchanged. But when you get back to real life and the demands of work, you can always pick up the phone and ask someone else in the group specific questions about a problem and solution they shared earlier.”

The Manufacturing Mastermind members are invited to all scheduled events, and the membership fee covers all activities, meals, and entertainment.
