These acquisitions, official by the end of February, mark a major turning point for Bleu Jour, which is ambitiously moving into new markets. Jean-Christophe Agobert, CEO of Bleu jour, comments on this new milestone for the Toulouse-based company: "Since its inception 20 years ago, Bleu Jour's strategy has always been to put design, performance and French production at the forefront of our plans. Today, the group's ambition is to develop three strong brands — Kubb, Schneider and MGG — around our expertise in order to meet the ever-increasing expectations of our business and private customers.

Through this initiative, Bleu Jour will have three brands, each with its own distinct product line: lifestyle mini PCs through KUBB, desktop PCs for professionals through Schneider and a line of gaming PCs and accessories through MGG/Millenium. These are all brands to which BLEU JOUR will apply its DNA.

Since its inception, Bleu Jour has designed and developed its own technical solutions for bringing innovative and differentiating products to market. This philosophy has enabled the company to win numerous international awards and attract a prestigious clientele, ranging from Hermès to Sony.

Over the years, Bleu Jour has applied its expertise, allowing it to offer superior quality products while remaining competitive with traditional players in the IT market.

In 2024, the company will inaugurate its new headquarters in Toulouse with more than 1,500 m2 dedicated to continuing the acceleration of its strategy. It's a strategy that extends beyond France, as Bleu Jour has sales offices in many countries.
