We wanted to share free information with people around the globe, to shed a positive light for those who may not have experience with autism and those who are currently seeking support and resources.”

The event will run for 44 hours because the CDC currently estimates that of eight-year-olds in the US, 1 in 44 has received an ASD diagnosis. For parents this is often an overwhelming new world that seems difficult to navigate without help and support. Many find themselves scouring the internet hoping to find good information about how to create the best outcomes for their children. It can be exhausting, overwhelming and ineffective. For teens and adults on the spectrum there is even less support. The goal of the Podcastathon is to provide information and inspiration to those on the spectrum, young and old, as well as the families, friends and professionals who love them.

Shannon Penrod is the host and producer of Autism Live, and the coordinator for the event. "We wanted to share information with people around the globe, to shed a positive light for those who may not have experience with autism and those who are currently seeking support and resources. It was very important to us to get good information available to all and have it be free to viewers. However, we are allowing for sponsorships that help defray the cost of production."
