Definition:

NFT music is a trend in the music industry. Technological innovations have influenced how music is made, played, saved, distributed, and enjoyed, from the first discs to streaming services like Spotify and Apple Music, from the birth of record changing to the rise of modern electronic sound. A number of singers and musicians like Grimes and iconic bands like the Rolling Stones were drawn to the new technology. An NFT is a rare item that is recorded on a digital ledger in the music industry. Non-fungible tokens (NFTs) swept the music industry this year. Hundreds of singers and musicians, including youthful multi-hyphenate artists like Grimes and iconic bands like the Rolling Stones, were drawn to the new technology. Some of these artists have made millions of dollars by selling tokenized versions of their tunes, digital art, or bundles of virtual and real-world products. NFTs and fan tokens have the potential to completely transform the music industry. COVID-19 will put an end to the live concert industry in 2020, with record labels taking a cut of ticket sales and artists profiting as well. NFT provides musicians with interesting opportunities to cut out some of the industry's intermediaries and third parties, as well as tokenize their work in a completely new way. Most musicians' managers, record labels, publishers, and other industry professionals make significantly more money from their music than the performers themselves, leaving them with only a little portion of the pie
