Identity theft and fraudulent life insurance are two types of financial crimes that can have devastating consequences for individuals and families.

Identity theft is a type of crime where an individual's personal information, such as their name, address, date of birth, and social security number is stolen and used without their consent to commit fraud and illegal activities. This information can be obtained through various means, such as phishing scams, data breaches, or physical theft. Once an identity thief has access to this information they can use it to open credit card accounts, make purchases, apply for loans, and life insurance.

Fraudulent life insurance is a type of crime where a individual applies for life insurance using false or misleading information. This can include misrepresenting their medical history, income or life stlyes. The purpose of this type of fraud is to obtain a policy that would not have been granted if correct information has been provided. The consequences of fraudulent life insurance can be significant sa the policy may not provide the intended financial protection for the beneficiaries or may be voided entirely.
