The thromboelastography guards against extreme blood loss or haemorrhage that happens during a surgery or after a serious injury. Since thromboelastography (TEG) performs a thorough in vitro analysis of the relationship between platelets, enzymes, fibrinogen, and other coagulation elements, it is more frequently used in cardiac surgery, organ transplants, and arteriovenous malformation surgeries where the anticipated blood loss is greater than 40% of the circulating blood volume. Patients who take antiaggregants like clopidogrel or aspirin can have their platelet activity measured through platelet imaging. By including TEG in the pre-anesthetic assessment, this is made feasible.
