Cosmetic packaging refers to the containers, tubes, bottles, and other materials used to store and protect cosmetic and personal care products such as skincare, haircare, makeup, and fragrances. The packaging is an essential element of the cosmetic product as it provides protection from external factors such as air, light, moisture, and contamination.

The US, Canada, and Mexico are major economies in North America. In recent years, there has been an increase in consciousness regarding personal appearance among individuals, leading to an increase in demand for cosmetic products and resulting in the growth of the cosmetic packaging market across the region. Further, North America is considered the biggest cosmetic market. Additionally, an increase in demand for cosmetics due to the shifting grooming trends among men and women is driving the growth of the cosmetic industry. In recent years, the cosmetic industry shifted from a feminine-oriented products base toward an industry serving all genders, which expanded the consumer base for the industry. The inception of male cosmetics users positively impacted the cosmetic industry.
