The market for hair extensions is mostly driven by the rising hair loss among individuals. Hair loss is a serious health problem right now. The effects of frantic lifestyles and inadequate nutrient intake on the human body are negative. Men are more likely to experience alopecia, a receding hairline, and pattern baldness, whereas women are more likely to experience hair thinning. In both men and women, androgenetic alopecia is a common kind of hair loss. During the industrial revolution, the wealthier male population and officers of particular ranks, such as lawyers and judges, were frequently seen wearing hair extensions.

The hair extensions market analysis is segmented on the basis of type, fitting type, distribution channel, end use, and region.

By type, the hair extensions market is classified into synthetic hair extensions, human hair extensions, and animal hair extensions. By fitting type, the market is classified into clip in, micro link, tape in, and glue in. By distribution channel, the market is segmented into retail stores, supermarkets, and e-commerce. By end use, the market is categorized into professional and personal.
