Market Overview:

Exocrine Pancreatic Insufficiency (EPI), also known as insufficient pancreatic enzymes, is an inability to properly digest food. EPI is common in people with Shwachman–Diamond Syndrome or cystic fibrosis. EPI is also caused by the gradual loss of pancreatic enzyme-producing cells. Exocrine Pancreatic Insufficiency, also known as EPI, can disrupt normal growth, life expectancy, and immune system response. Exocrine pancreatic dysfunction (EPI) is characterized by symptoms such as diarrhea and steatorrhea.

Exocrine Pancreatic Insufficiency Market is growing due to rising incidences and demand for advanced therapeutics. The strong presence of a significant number of pipeline drugs is another factor that has contributed to the growth of exocrine pancreatic insufficiency.

The key barriers to the growth of the exocrine pancreatic insufficiency industry are a lack of technological awareness and technology reach in many emerging countries. Market growth is affected by strict regulatory measures and difficulties in getting approvals for drugs from regulatory authorities.

Exocrine pancreatic insufficiency market growth is key to developing countries' rising geriatric population. Growing awareness and technological advances in these countries make it possible for the market to grow.
