Demand, an online 3D printing platform for orthodontists, and SprintRay, a technology company that builds end-to-end 3D printing ecosystems, are pleased to announce compatibility of their two systems. The companies have signed a technology agreement to expand orthodontist’s access to in-office production of fixed appliances.

“Most orthodontists are already printing aligners and retainers in their offices. Our agreement with SprintRay will now enable orthodontists to better utilize their in-office capabilities by allowing them to easily print a variety of fixed appliances as needed without having to hold excess inventory,” said Braces On Demand Founder and CEO, Colin Corey. “SprintRay printers are incredibly fast and offer busy offices high production throughput which can significantly improve workflow efficiency.”

“The orthodontic community is one of the fastest adopters of 3D printing technology, transforming highly manual processes into digital, repeatable workflows,” said SprintRay CEO and Co-Founder Amir Mansouri, Ph.D. “SprintRay is proud to partner with Braces On Demand to continue providing industry-leading advances in digital orthodontics and chairside dentistry through seamless solutions for doctors to efficiently and effectively treat their patients and build their practices.”

Braces On Demand was founded in 2019 and received FDA-approval the following year. Created with the purpose of developing a web application that allows orthodontists to easily 3D print customized brackets and fixed appliances in their office, Braces On Demand is revolutionizing the orthodontic industry and will be exhibiting this month at the American Association of Orthodontists Annual Session in Chicago, booth #1747.
