Ethan Putterman discusses some challenges high school students face when applying to universities and colleges. Of these, he highlights the role of technology in transforming post-secondary education in the United States and globally.

"A lot of students tend to drop out during their sophomore year for a few reasons relating to their inexperience, so I provide advice to help them work through that. I also offer admissions advice for high school students and their parents. I look at their transcripts and background as well as their admissions essays and personal statements, then point them in the direction they should go to improve and help them get into a top ten university. There is also a small team of tutors that I oversee and they tutor students who are preparing for the ACT, SAT and AP examinations."

Having spent years consulting students over the course of his career, Ethan Putterman found that many students are unprepared for the post-secondary experience. "I spent thousands of hours consulting students and I found that a lot of them are not prepared when they enter university. Unfortunately, most guidance counselors are former high school teachers and almost all of the educational consultants in the field are administrators and come from a completely different background. Many were administrators but lack classroom experience or vice-versa. It's very rare that you'll find a retired professor emeritus or former tenured professor with his own company."

Putterman's strategy is to provide an accurate representation of university life while highlighting the academic expectations. He states that he enjoys working with younger students who are just starting to think about their future as he can provide valuable insight early on in the process. When asked, "What is one piece of advice that you have never forgotten?" he states,

"Humility is very important and plays a big part in listening and being sensitive to the nuanced, individualized concerns of students. When you show humility, it shows that you are accessible and helps students feel comfortable asking questions. Another piece of advice is to always assume that the person you're speaking to may be smarter than you are. This will compel you to bring your A-game to everything. It was a famous Harvard professor who came up with this pedagogical advice, and it has served thousands of students well."

As someone truly passionate about his career, Putterman remains a reliable source of information for high school students looking to pursue higher education as his consultancy practice expands beyond Florida to the West Coast.
