Dating and Matchmaking markets are multi-billion dollar industries consisting of online dating services, apps for mobile devices, matchmakers and dating coaches. Over recent years, this market has experienced substantial growth as more singles accept online dating platforms and become comfortable using them to find dates.

Online and mobile dating platforms have become the go-to method of meeting potential partners, such as dating apps like Match.com and eHarmony, for meeting prospective mates. These services match users using algorithms based on interests, preferences and behaviors; making these two apps and sites among the most sought-after dating solutions.

People seeking personalized matchmaking may also opt for dating coaches or matchmakers. Matchmakers specialize in matching potential matches to their clients directly while dating coaches provide advice and support so clients can develop effective dating strategies and skills.

Many companies are competing for their share of the dating and matchmaking industry. Key players in the field include Match Group (which owns Match.com and Tinder among other popular dating platforms), eHarmony and Bumble as some examples.

As more people utilize online dating and other matchmaking services to find love and companionship, it is likely that the market for dating and matchmaking will expand further.
