Stem cell treatment, commonly referred to as regenerative medicine, uses stem cells or their byproducts to encourage the repair response of sick, malfunctioning, or wounded tissue. It is the next step in the transplantation of organs, replacing donor organs—which are scarce—with cells. In the body, stem cells have the capacity to differentiate into a wide variety of cell types. They act as the body's system for repairs. Adult stem cells and embryonic stem cells are the two primary categories of stem cells. The two main categories of stem cells are multipotent and pluripotent. Replicating cells called pluripotent stem cells are derived from foetal or embryonic organs.
