Nanoemulsion Market Analysis

Nanoemulsion is the process of suspension of minimicrons of globules of one liquid to other liquids that are immiscible to each other. Nanoemulsions are oil-in-water emulsions with mean size ranging from 50 to 1000 nm. Average size of a droplet is between 100 and 500 nm. Nanoemulsions are made from surfactants approved for human consumption and food substances that are recognized as safe by the U.S. FDA.

Nanoemulsion can be prepared using several techniques such as micro fluidization, high pressure homogenization and sonication. Nanoemulsion is also called miniemulsion, ultrafine emulsion, and submicron emulsion. Nanoemulsions can dissolve large quantities of hydrophobics, this along with its high compatibility and ability to protect drugs from hydrolysis and enzymatic degradation make them ideal vehicles for transport. There are several advantages of nanoemulsion over conventional emulsion. One such advantage is the extreme micro-droplet size of nanoemulsion with high surface area, which makes them highly effective as a transportation system.
