For almost 20 years, Romana King has worked as a financial journalist, covering everything from the global economic crisis and American housing collapse to the original dot-com tech-bubble burst to housing market trends across Canada and America. She was one of the first to write about the emergence of exchange-traded funds (ETFs) and helped pioneer the personal finance discussion regarding homeownership as an asset (as well as a liability). She has covered home insurance, various property and casualty coverage issues, and the need for universal financial literacy education.
