Embolotherapy is a minimally invasive medical procedure that involves the deliberate occlusion or blockage of blood vessels using embolic agents. It is primarily used to treat various conditions by cutting off blood supply to targeted areas. The procedure is typically performed by an interventional radiologist or an interventional neuroradiologist using image-guided techniques such as fluoroscopy or angiography.

During embolotherapy, embolic agents are introduced into the blood vessels through a catheter. These embolic agents can be solid particles, liquids, or coils, depending on the specific condition being treated. They are carefully selected to cause occlusion or blockage of the blood vessel, which leads to the desired therapeutic effect. Embolotherapy can be used to treat a wide range of conditions, including certain types of tumors, vascular malformations, aneurysms, uterine fibroids, and varicose veins.
