Vascular closure devices (VCDs) are medical devices used to achieve hemostasis, which is the stopping of bleeding, at the site where a catheterization procedure was performed to access the blood vessels. These devices are designed to seal the puncture site in the artery or vein, thereby reducing the time and effort required for manual compression and potentially minimizing complications associated with bleeding. VCDs are commonly used in cardiac catheterization procedures, such as angioplasty, stenting, and diagnostic angiography, as well as in other interventions that involve the percutaneous insertion of catheters or sheaths into blood vessels.

Vascular closure devices can be categorized into different types, including mechanical, suture-mediated, and collagen-based closure devices. Mechanical devices use clips, plugs, or sutures to achieve hemostasis by physically sealing the puncture site. Suture-mediated devices employ a collagen anchor, which is inserted into the artery or vein, and a suture that is pulled to achieve closure. Collagen-based devices work by promoting the formation of a platelet plug and initiating the coagulation cascade to seal the vessel. These devices offer the advantage of shorter hemostasis times, reduced patient discomfort, and earlier ambulation compared to manual compression techniques.
