Compound management refers to the systematic handling, storage, and distribution of chemical compounds in pharmaceutical, biotechnology, and research organizations. It involves the organization and maintenance of compound libraries, which are collections of small molecules or compounds used for drug discovery, screening, and other research purposes. Compound management encompasses a range of activities, including compound acquisition, storage, quality control, inventory management, and distribution to support efficient and effective drug discovery processes.

In compound management, the primary focus is on maintaining the integrity and quality of chemical compounds throughout their lifecycle. This includes ensuring proper storage conditions, such as temperature and humidity control, to prevent degradation or chemical instability. Compound management teams are responsible for tracking compound inventory, managing databases, and implementing processes to efficiently retrieve and distribute compounds to researchers when needed. They also conduct quality control checks, such as compound identity verification and purity assessment, to ensure the reliability and accuracy of the compound libraries. Effective compound management practices are crucial for enabling high-throughput screening, lead optimization, and the overall success of drug discovery programs.
