Topical drug delivery refers to the administration of medications or therapeutic agents directly onto the skin or mucous membranes to achieve a local effect. It involves the application of creams, gels, ointments, lotions, sprays, or patches that contain active ingredients designed to be absorbed through the skin and exert their therapeutic action at the site of application. Topical drug delivery is commonly used in dermatology, pain management, wound care, and various other medical specialties.

Different mechanisms contribute to the absorption of drugs through the skin, including diffusion, iontophoresis, and chemical enhancers. Factors such as the physicochemical properties of the drug, the condition of the skin or mucous membrane, the formulation of the topical product, and the duration of contact influence the extent and rate of drug absorption. Topical drug delivery offers a versatile and effective means of delivering medications directly to the target site, providing localized therapy for various dermatological conditions, pain management, and other medical applications.
