Laser cancer therapy, also known as laser ablation or laser-induced interstitial thermotherapy, is a minimally invasive medical procedure that uses laser energy to target and destroy cancer cells. It is a localized treatment approach that focuses on specific tumor sites, offering a potential alternative to traditional surgical methods or radiation therapy for certain types of cancer.

During laser cancer therapy, a high-energy laser beam is directed into the tumor or cancerous tissue. The laser energy generates heat, which destroys the cancer cells by causing cellular damage and inducing coagulation. The precise targeting of the laser allows for selective destruction of the tumor while minimizing damage to surrounding healthy tissues. The procedure is typically performed using image guidance techniques such as ultrasound, MRI, or CT scans to accurately locate the tumor and monitor the treatment progress in real-time.
