Internal tissue sealants, also known as surgical sealants or tissue adhesives, are medical products used to seal and close internal tissues or organs during surgical procedures. These sealants are designed to promote tissue healing, provide a barrier against fluid leakage, and support wound closure. They are particularly useful in situations where traditional sutures or staples may be challenging or insufficient.

Internal tissue sealants can be classified into different types based on their composition and mechanism of action. Some sealants are made of biocompatible synthetic materials that adhere to the tissue surface, forming a protective barrier. These sealants may include cyanoacrylate-based adhesives, fibrin sealants, or polyethylene glycol-based products. Other types of sealants are derived from biological sources, such as collagen or thrombin, and work by promoting clot formation or tissue regeneration. The choice of sealant depends on the specific surgical procedure, the type of tissue being treated, and the desired outcome.
