Viral clearance service refers to a specialized process carried out by contract testing laboratories to ensure the safety and quality of biopharmaceutical products. It involves conducting studies and tests to evaluate and demonstrate the effectiveness of viral removal or inactivation steps during the manufacturing process of biologics, including vaccines, therapeutic proteins, and gene therapies. The goal of viral clearance is to minimize the risk of viral contamination and transmission to patients receiving these biopharmaceutical products.

During viral clearance studies, various techniques and methods are employed to assess the capability of the manufacturing process to eliminate or inactivate a broad range of viruses. This typically includes using model viruses that are representative of a variety of viral families, including both enveloped and non-enveloped viruses. The samples are subjected to the purification steps and conditions used in the manufacturing process, and the efficacy of viral removal or inactivation is assessed by measuring the viral load before and after the purification process. The results of these studies are crucial in establishing the safety and regulatory compliance of biopharmaceutical products, ensuring that they meet stringent quality standards and pose minimal risk of viral contamination to patients.
