Biologic imaging reagents, also known as molecular imaging agents or contrast agents, are substances used in medical imaging techniques to enhance the visibility and detection of specific biological structures or processes within the body. These reagents are designed to interact with target molecules or tissues of interest, allowing for improved visualization and characterization of biological structures or functions. They are utilized in various imaging modalities, including positron emission tomography (PET), single-photon emission computed tomography (SPECT), magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), ultrasound, and optical imaging.

Biologic imaging reagents can take different forms depending on the imaging modality and the specific target being studied. For example, in PET and SPECT imaging, radiopharmaceuticals are commonly used as imaging reagents. These radiopharmaceuticals consist of a radioactive tracer molecule that emits gamma rays or positrons, which can be detected by the imaging system. In MRI, contrast agents containing paramagnetic or superparamagnetic substances are employed to alter the magnetic properties of tissues, enhancing the contrast and providing detailed anatomical and functional information. Optical imaging reagents often utilize fluorescent or luminescent molecules that emit light when exposed to specific wavelengths, allowing for the visualization of specific cellular or molecular targets.
