Specimen retrieval refers to the process of collecting, extracting, or retrieving biological samples or specimens from the human body for diagnostic or research purposes. It is a crucial step in various medical procedures, including surgery, endoscopy, and minimally invasive interventions. Specimens retrieved during these procedures are then analyzed in laboratories to provide valuable insights into the patient's health condition, aid in disease diagnosis, guide treatment decisions, or contribute to scientific research.

The specific method of specimen retrieval depends on the type of procedure and the intended purpose of the specimen. In surgical procedures, specimens are often retrieved by excising a portion of tissue, such as a tumor, lesion, or organ, using surgical instruments. These tissue specimens are then sent to the pathology department for microscopic examination and analysis. In minimally invasive procedures, such as laparoscopy or endoscopy, specialized instruments are used to access and retrieve samples from specific anatomical sites. These samples may include biopsies, fluid samples, or tissue fragments, which are subsequently processed and examined in the laboratory to provide diagnostic or research information.
