Oncology drugs, also known as anticancer drugs or cancer therapeutics, are medications specifically designed to treat various types of cancer. They are a key component of cancer treatment and are used to target cancer cells and inhibit their growth or destroy them. Oncology drugs can be administered through different routes, including oral ingestion, intravenous infusion, or injections.

There are several classes of oncology drugs, each with its own mechanism of action. Chemotherapy drugs, for example, work by interfering with the cell division process in cancer cells, preventing their proliferation. Targeted therapy drugs, on the other hand, are designed to specifically target certain molecules or pathways that are involved in cancer growth and progression. Immunotherapy drugs harness the body's immune system to recognize and attack cancer cells. Hormone therapy drugs are used to block the effects of certain hormones that can promote the growth of hormone-sensitive cancers like breast and prostate cancer. Additionally, there are also supportive care drugs used to manage the side effects of cancer treatment, such as antiemetics to control nausea and pain medications for pain management.
