A branch of dermatology called teledermatology uses digital medical information sharing and telecommunication technology to diagnose, track, and treat skin disorders like eczema, melanoma, psoriasis, and others. Healthcare administration and medical instruction are two examples of teledermatology applications. Telediagnosis, telehomecare, and direct consultation are all included in healthcare management. In a direct consultation, the patient makes a telephone appointment to see a dermatologist for a consultation, diagnosis, and therapy. Such appointment bookings heavily rely on mobile applications. In telediagnosis, a triage tool is used to forecast patient outcomes using artificial intelligence (AI) software based on the predictive data contained in the AI system database.
