Remote dispensing systems are automated pharmacy systems that enable the remote and secure dispensing of medications to patients. These systems are designed to bridge the gap between patients and pharmacies, particularly in areas with limited access to healthcare facilities or in situations where physical pharmacies may be impractical or unavailable. Remote dispensing systems utilize advanced technology, including robotics and telecommunication, to accurately dispense medications based on prescriptions received electronically.

These systems typically consist of a secure, self-service kiosk or unit located at a remote location, such as a community health center or a rural area. Patients can interact with the system through a user-friendly interface to submit their prescriptions and receive their medications. Pharmacists, who may be located at a central pharmacy location, remotely review and verify the prescriptions before the medications are dispensed by the system. The medications are usually dispensed in unit-dose packaging or blister packs, ensuring accurate and convenient dosing for patients.
