whether they are working at a desk developing a new product for customer or out in the field interacting directly with customers. After pandemic, skill competency building has become even more important owing to acceleration of digital technology and shifting customer expectations. For instance, as more clients are utilizing digital realm, delivery executives are acquiring new approaches and skills as post-COVID purchase orders have grown. Therefore, they must effectively manage huge volume products and are not allowed to misdeliver goods or delay deliveries. The company's reputation will be impacted by this, hence they must pick up new techniques and tools that facilitate

A recent trend in the market is increase in attention of well-being and mental health. COVID-19 increased mental health issues in the workplace as anxiety, depression, and unemployment are at an all-time high. In 2021, managers needed to intentionally focus on employee wellbeing. Since frontline personnel were the most severely affected by this ongoing tragedy, they required more resources than ever before. Businesses can better engage and connect with their workforce by employing softer tones in company-wide and team messages as well as training programs and there will also be a change in the leadership. Leader attitudes have changed significantly, moving from a rigid, black-and-white manner to a more intuitive, individual-focused, and almost humanitarian style of operation. In addition, leaders are increasingly aware of how experience and culture affect financial results. These factors together made employee well-being a top priority for majority of executives in 2021.
