Meat generated in cell culture rather than inside animals is known as clean meat. Proponents prefer the phrase "clean meat," also known as cultured meat, in vitro meat, or lab-grown meat because the meat is said to be cleaner than meat from slaughtered animals in terms of hygiene and environmental friendliness. Its real meat produced (or brewed) from animal cells, as well as other clean animal products that don't need animal cells at all and are created from the molecule up. As the consumption of meat increases the demand for clean meat is also increasing. North America is the largest market for clean meat followed by Europe due to the high consumption of meat.
