Definition:

Draught beer is a lager put away into barrels or kegs and served directly from the tap. The tap can be pressurized or siphoned manually. There are a few reasons why Draught beer has predominant quality over different sorts of lager. In the first place, the barrel blocks sunlight away, killing degradation from light. The keg likewise keeps oxygen from leaking in, consequently keeping the brew new for a longer time. Draught beer is normally burned-through at a quicker rate, which implies that lager is put away for less time and is kept new.
