The demand for legal information and research by law firms, business legal departments, and governmental organizations drives the Europe legal publication market. For instance, citizens and residents of EU nations have the legal right to view the documents of the European Parliament, the European Council, and the European Commission under Article 15 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union. Customers can now access legal information online due to the expansion of digital platforms brought about by technological improvements. In the upcoming years, the market is likely to expand owing to the rising demand for legal services and the adoption of digital platforms.

According to the Astute Analytica analysis, the Europe legal publishing market is anticipated to continue growing in the years to come. Major businesses are likely to invest extensively in digital platforms and new product offerings to address the evolving needs of legal professionals due to the rising demand for open-access publishing and legal analytics tools. Additionally, the region's demand for law colleges and universities will increase owing to the rising demand for legal services across several industries and sectors. More than 3,000 law universities around Europe have more than 1.3 million students studying law. Due to the expanding need for legal experts across numerous businesses and sectors, the number of law students has been rising consistently over time.

For a long time, legal books served as the primary source of legal knowledge. They remain a favorite among legal practitioners, especially for in-depth research and analysis. For instance, Hart is a well-known publisher of legal resources and publications and the residence of a large number of honorable mention authors.

Solutions are likely to hold a share of more than 64% of the market in Europe. This implies that there is an increase in the need for digital resources among legal practitioners in the region who want quick access to legal information and analysis. Legal professionals are increasingly using tools, including case management software, e-discovery tools, and legal research software.

Print media is likely to have a more than 61% revenue share in the legal publishing market. Print media continues to be a major source of legal information despite the rise of digital publishing in recent years, especially for more thorough legal resources like textbooks and periodicals. This provides more evidence that print publications are still in high demand among legal professionals, particularly for in-depth research on case law or specialized legal themes.

The top three nations in the Europe market are the United Kingdom, Germany, and France. Their dominance in the market is due to factors, including the abundance of law schools and students, the prominence of legal publications, the high demand for attorneys, sizable populations, and high crime rates.

Compared to other European nations, the UK, Germany, and France have larger populations, creating a larger market for legal services and, subsequently, for legal publication. As of 2021, the World Bank estimates that roughly 83 million people are living in Germany, 67 million in France, and close to 67 million in the UK. The demand for legal resources and information is increasing owing to the growing population.

Due to the large number of law schools in the UK, Germany, and France, there is a high need for legal publications and materials. Data from the European Legal Education Association show that there are over 150 law schools in the UK, over 40 in Germany, and about 70 in France. Due to the enormous number of students studying law in these nations, there is a considerable market for legal publication.
