With a mission to offer cannabis enthusiasts a diverse range of top-tier products, customers can expect a superior experience from start to finish.

Over the past decade and a half, the landscape of the cannabis industry in South Los Angeles has undergone a dynamic transformation, emerging as a thriving industry that is changing the face of this part of the city.

In 2006, the concept of medical cannabis was still novel in South Los Angeles. Few dispensaries were established, and they operated in a gray area of the law, as regulation was minimal and societal acceptance still in its early stages.

The medical marijuana industry began to gain traction in 2008, with an increasing number of dispensaries emerging across the city. South Los Angeles, however, remained relatively quiet in this burgeoning industry, mainly due to social and economic factors that limited the establishment and growth of dispensaries in this area.

Significant changes came in 2016 with the passage of Proposition 64, which legalized recreational marijuana use in California. This development prompted a shift in the public's perception and acceptance of cannabis, opening up opportunities for industry growth in South Los Angeles.

However, the city recognized the need for comprehensive regulation and oversight of the cannabis industry. Following the legalization of recreational use, Los Angeles implemented a new framework for granting licenses to cannabis operators. This new approach, implemented in 2018, ensured the safety of cannabis products, promoted public order, and also aimed to stimulate economic growth in various parts of the city, including South Los Angeles.

A notable development in this period was the introduction of the Social Equity Program by the city, aimed at addressing historical injustices linked to cannabis criminalization. This program specifically targeted those most impacted by the enforcement of previous cannabis laws, including low-income individuals, people with past cannabis convictions, and residents of neighborhoods that were disproportionately affected.

In South Los Angeles, a region historically burdened with high rates of cannabis-related arrests, the Social Equity Program was particularly relevant. The program facilitated the establishment of legal cannabis businesses in the area, creating job opportunities and contributing to local economic growth.

By 2023, the cannabis industry in South Los Angeles had transformed significantly. Several licensed dispensaries now operate in the area, offering a wide range of cannabis products, from flowers and pre-rolls to edibles and concentrates. These dispensaries also provide employment opportunities for local residents, contributing to the area's economic development.

Nestled in South Los Angeles, PACKS is easily accessible from iconic local landmarks such as the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum and the Natural History Museum.
