and Sustainable Energy Leader*

Kenneth W. Welch Jr., renowned for his pioneering work in wave-driven hydropower systems, sees young minds as the forefront of creativity and problem-solving. He believes in their potential to address complex global challenges and emphasizes the importance of nurturing and investing in their ideas.

One of the key highlights of the Wall Street Times feature is the youth-led takeover, an innovative approach allowing young people to control digital channels throughout

August. While Mr. Welch praises the concept, he calls for more tangible opportunities for youth engagement, stating, "The takeover should lead to real engagement with decision-makers. The youth deserve more than a temporary spotlight."

Reflecting on the broader challenges facing the world on the road to 2030, Mr. Welch recognizes the role of youth as critical at this juncture. He urges businesses, governments, and communities to actively collaborate with youth, invest in their ideas, and provide platforms for meaningful dialogue. "We must go beyond hashtags," he insists, emphasizing the need for real opportunities and recognition of the hard work and creativity of our youth.

The feature concludes with a powerful call to action, resonating with readers and weaving together themes of innovation, collaboration, and empowerment. Kenneth W. Welch Jr.'s insights serve as both a guide and a challenge, reminding us all that sustainability and progress require more than platitudes. "Let's create real opportunities," he urges, "and recognize the hard work and creativity of our youth."
